laws in the Constitution that people must obey and be forced to obey. It is a simple idea, but one that has been used for centuries. In fact, the concept of laws is so fundamental that it is often taken for granted. However, it is worth thinking about the origins of laws and how they have evolved over time. In many cultures, laws were first created by religious leaders or rulers, and they were often based on religious beliefs or traditions. Over time, laws became more secular and more based on the needs of the community. Today, laws are created by governments and are based on a variety of factors, including social norms, economic needs, and scientific knowledge. The process of creating laws is often a complex one, involving many different stakeholders and a long period of deliberation. However, the goal is always the same: to create a set of rules that will govern the behavior of the community and promote the common good.

So why does a zombie TV show refuse to mention zombies? According to creator Robert Kirkman, the reason is simply because the show is set in a world where zombies never existed in fiction. In the world of The Walking Dead, zombies are a new phenomenon, and the characters have never heard of them before. This is a key element of the show's premise, and it is what makes the story so interesting. If the characters had known about zombies, the story would be completely different. Instead, they are forced to deal with a new and terrifying threat that they have never seen before. This is what makes The Walking Dead such a unique and compelling series.
